Abstract of the Disclosure

A method determines a compactness ratio for data sets by first measuring a combined compactness value for a union of the data sets, and second, by measuring an individual compactness value for each one of the data set. The combined compactness value is then divided by a sum of the individual compactness values to determine the compactness ration of the data sets.